

GRANVILLE INN

Est. 1924

The Granville Inn was built in 1924 by John Sutphin Jones, a self-made businessman whose railroad career led him to Granville. Here, he met and married the well-to-do Sarah Follett and fell in love with the area's natural beauty. Inspired by his picturesque surroundings and the growing popularity of automobiles and paved roads, Jones set out to create a spectacular showplace that would bring tourists to his beloved Ohio village.

Jones purchased the land that was once home to The Granville Female College and enlisted the services of prominent architect Frank Packard, who designed the Inn to resemble an English country manor. The original building offered 24 sleeping rooms, an oak-paneled great hall lobby, and an unroofed piazza where guests danced under the stars. The cost of this extravagant venture was estimated at $600,000, prompting a well-known hotel magazine to call it "the costliest small hotel of any place in America, if not the world."

An estimated 5,000 guests attended the grand opening on June 26, 1924, and many prosperous years followed. The Inn received its first facelift in 1950, but the early 1970s brought hard times. In 1976 the Inn was sold for $190,000 to Paul Kent and his son Robert Kent, who turned the oak-paneled lobby into a dining room and created a tavern in the small sunroom. In 2003, the Kent family sold the Inn to Granville Hospitality, but the recession led to the property's foreclosure in 2011.

Nearby Denison University hosted many prospective families and students at the Granville Inn through the years and understood its significance to the town. In 2013, Denison purchased the storied property for $1.25 million and began an extraordinary $9 million renovation.
